

shop retail price, it is good value. It is, however, shaming to have to comment that the standard of reproduction of the half-tone illustrations is the poorest of all the catalogues I have seen though from identical original photographs. The ludicrous waste of a second colour on what must be the duller cover of the archaeological publishing year also suggests that British Museum Publications Ltd could well take a leaf out of the creative book of the prehistoric Gauls when it comes to the effective and economic use of colour in design.

David M. Pendergast: Excavations at Altun Ha, Belize, 1964-1970, Vol. 1: Toronto: Royal Ontario Museum, 1979. 226 pp., 122 illus. and loose plans, boxed.

Altun Ha is a small Classic Maya site in the coastal plain of Belize, a few km from the shallow waters of the Caribbean; its two modest ceremonial plazas, bordered by steep pyramids and long low ranges of elite residences, and the dense but compact surrounding settlement, had never excited attention from archaeologists when David Pendergast made his initial reconnaissance there in 1963. Neither the location, amidst swamps and with the most voracious mosquitoes in Central America, nor the region, generally considered to be a backwater in Maya archaeology, gave any indication that excavation was likely to prove productive.

A series of preliminary reports and topical papers over the past 15 years has shown us how wrong these initial assumptions were, and how right Pendergast was to ignore them: Altun Ha has shown that the small centres of the Maya periphery are as complex in their history, and as tantalising in the questions they raise, as any of the giant sites of the inland areas where research was concentrated for more than a century. While this first volume does not touch upon them in any detail, it is clear from extant publications that maritime links around the Yucatan Peninsula, and close interaction between land and sea communications, were of immense importance in Maya prehistory from the Late Formative (400 bc-AD 250) onwards; Pendergast points out that Altun Ha was effectively marine in its orientation, though not actually on the swampy coastline, and certainly the site's incredible wealth of jade can only be explained in terms of an intermediary, gateway function.

Explanation has, however, been left for a later volume: Pendergast is an old-fashioned archaeologist (certainly in Mesoamerica) in that he prefers to preface his conclusions with evidence, and the present volume deals only with preliminaries and with the excavations in, and stratigraphic sequence of Group A, one of the two plazas comprising the ceremonial precinct. The bulk of the volume, some 150 pages, describes in clear and very welcome detail the structural sequence for each of the nine buildings, including the caches and burials and their contents, vital for precise dating and revelatory in their range and richness. The drawings of pottery and small finds, by Georgina Hosek and David Findlay, and the large-scale plans of architecture by Stanley Loten, are the best published in the Maya field. As a result, the archaeology of Altun Ha comes to life in a way unequalled by other reports, and perhaps more important, all the evidence is there to check, confirm or challenge Pendergast's conclusions. As a lesson in how to present basic information so that it can be understood, and how to integrate drawings with text, the report should be read by all of us.

Dr Pendergast makes no concessions to the non-specialist, however: while his terminology and methods are made admirably explicit, even the summary at the end of the volume is just that—a resumé of the complex stratigraphic exposition, but with no attempt to explain why the Altun Ha excavations and their results are of prime importance. The promised summary volume will be both a welcome and a necessary guide to the project's results; certainly the standard set in this first volume enhances our anticipation.

James Dyer: The Penguin guide to prehistoric England and Wales. London: Allen Lane, 1981, 384 pp., 32 pls., 44 figs. £9.50.

The British prehistoric heritage of upstanding field monuments, staggering in quantity, in variety fascinating and incomparable among countries of the Old World, continues to prompt archaeologists to write guide books for their visitors. The general public cannot, it seems, have too many of them. Jacquetta Hawkes began the vogue with A guide to the prehistoric and Roman monuments in England and Wales in 1954—republished, inevitably, in 1973. Filled with scholarly comment and graced by much beautiful writing, its flowing narrative never allowed it to be the easiest of books to use in the field. Hence your reviewer, in 1960, preferred a more prosaic but functional approach to this growing need with his Guide to prehistoric England—reprinted, need it be added, in 1976 and avidly taken up by the Ancient History Book Club. The new systematic arrangement was by counties, each group of sites described chronologically. He told visitors how to get there, what to see, where the finds were, if any; and supplied a site bibliography. He topped and tailed it with introduction, glossary and index and the genre was established. He stuck to England and stopped
