

Face-to-Face: Cross-Cultural Collaboration in Provision and Delivery

Abstract This chapter documents and analyses case studies of Arab-European collaboration in delivering video content for children. With the aim of exploring sources of cultural and financial power, it starts by citing examples of some issues that have arisen in cross-regional provision of children's screen content, around what makes it "local," its language, its purpose (fun, education or both) and its appropriateness in certain cultural settings. Keeping these issues in mind, the chapter then presents four case studies of European-Arab collaboration revolving around an app, a series of short educational videos for use on tablets, a digital platform and scripts under development for film and TV, from which it draws insights into the dynamics of production and sites of decision-making about what makes it to screen.

Keywords Children's screen production • Dubbing and translation • Disney • Modern Standard Arabic • Netflix • Children's entertainment and learning

The financial landscape for children's content creation is changing in Europe and the Arab region, with some new commissioning by over-the-top (OTT) providers of video-on-demand via the internet. Through co-productions with a few selected local companies, these providers offer a new source of investment, which has been welcomed by producers who
