FACING THE HOLOCAUST

JPS

From the Introduction by Gila Ramras-Rauch

"In Holocaust literature, the fantastic emerges both as a thematic element and as a structural element. Generally, fantastic literature demands a suspension of disbelief on the part of the reader—and we are willing, usually, to accept our disbelief for the sake of a partial fulfillment of our model thinking or the reaffirmation of social values. In the case of Holocaust literature, however, all this becomes far more problematic—and burning questions, historicity and belief, are now challenged in new and harmful ways. Thus, we cannot suspend our belief in the actual events, but at the same time we suspend our disbelief can be demanded—because the real is so horrible in character!"

Foreword (Revised) by Gershon Shaked

"In Israel, survivors and witnesses live among each other, chambers and observances of the most intense speech is being heard. Each group tried to deal with that experience in its own way, producing various models of literary expression that historical experience. All of these models are a human effort to depict in order to remember and to understand in order to learn to live with the trauma."
