There once was a king of Persia who at the beginning of his reign had distinguished himself by many glorious and successful conquests and had afterwards enjoyed such profound peace and tranquillity as rendered him the happiest of monarchs His only occasion for regret was that he had no heir to succeed him in the kingdom after his death One day according to the custom of his royal predecessors during their residence in the capital he held an assembly of his courtiers at which all the ambassadors and strangers of renown at his court were present Among these there appeared a merchant from a far distant country who sent a message to the king craving an audience as he wished to speak to him about a very important matter The king gave orders for the merchant to be instantly admitted and when the assembly was over and all the rest of the company had retired the king inquired what was the business which had brought him to the palace Sire replied the merchant I have with me and beg your majesty to behold the most beautiful and charming slave it would be possible to find if you searched every corner of the earth if you will but see her you will surely wish to make her your wife The fair slave was by the king's commands immediately brought in and no sooner had the king beheld a lady whose beauty and grace surpassed anything he had ever imagined than he fell passionately in love with her and determined to marry her at once This was done So the king caused the fair slave to be lodged in the next finest apartment to his own and gave particular orders to the matrons and the women slaves appointed to attend her that they should dress her in the richest robe they could find and carry her the finest pearl necklaces the brightest diamonds and other the richest precious stones that she might choose those she liked best The King of Persia's capital was situated in an island and his palace which was very magnificent was built upon the sea shore his window looked towards the sea and the fair slave's which was pretty near it had also the same prospect and it was the more pleasant on account of the sea's beating almost against the foot of the wall At the end of three days the fair slave

magnificently dressed was alone in her chamber sitting upon a sofa and leaning against one of the windows that faced the sea when the king being informed that he might visit her came in The slave hearing somebody walk in the room immediately turned her head to see who it was She knew him to be the king but without showing the least surprise or so much as rising from her seat to salute or receive him she turned back to the window again as if he had been the most insignificant person in the world The King of Persia was extremely surprised to see a slave of so beauteous a form so very ignorant of the world He attributed this to the narrowness of her education and the little care that had been taken to instruct her in the first rules of civility He went to her at the window where notwithstanding the coldness and indifference with which she had just now received him she suffered herself to be admired kissed and embraced as much as he pleased but answered him not a word My dearest life said the king you neither answer nor by any visible token give me the least reason to believe that you are listening to me Why will you still keep to this obstinate silence which chills me Do you mourn for your country your friends or your relations Alas is not the King of Persia who loves and adores you capable of comforting and making you amends for the loss of everything in the world But the fair slave continued her astonishing reserve and keeping her eyes still fixed upon the ground would neither look at him nor utter a word but after they had dined together in absolute silence the king went to the women whom he had assigned to the fair slave as her attendants and asked them if they had ever heard her speak One of them presently made answer Sire we have neither seen her open her lips nor heard her speak any more than your majesty has just now we have rendered her our services we have combed and dressed her hair put on her clothes and waited upon her in her chamber but she has never opened her lips so much as to say That is well or I like this We have often asked Madam do you want anything Is there anything you wish for Do but ask and command us but we have never been able to draw a word from her We cannot tell whether her silence proceeds from pride sorrow stupidity or dumbness and this is all we can inform your majesty
