My Faith in the Atomic Future

By Lewis L. Strauss

Chairman, U. S. Atomic Energy Commission

As told to James Monahan

MANY PEOPLE regard the atomic discoveries of recent years as part of a nightmare that disrupts the peaceful dreams of civilized man. I do not believe history will see them in that light. We have gained control over natural forces that can advance civilization, even within a single generation, to a point which man has never attained before. I believe firmly that our knowledge of the atom is intended by the Creator for the service and not the destruction of mankind.

The Atomic Energy Act of 1946 was a farsighted law. But I had certain specific reservations about it. Nuclear energy, which I believed could change the world, was strait-jacketed in Government regulations. Research, development, patents, manufacturing and possession of fissionable materials were denied to private enterprise. Atomic energy was an absolute Government monopoly.

Atomic weapons development is necessarily a Government responsibility. But I was convinced that developments in agriculture, industry and power production would not be realized fully until the field was opened to the genius and enterprise of American industry.

Actually, the restrictions might have been relaxed sooner but for
