

Dearest Remembrance,

There has been the most awful row. Papa went in by accident yesterday morning to get a shoe-iron, and found Mr. Maphson in Godfrey's bed. He was most terribly angry, told Mr. Maphson that he would have to go away out of England and live abroad for ever and ever, or he would have him put in prison, and scolded at Godfrey like anything, and said he would flog him, only he was too old to be flogged, but he ought to be flogged, and that he had disgraced himself and his family, and that it could never be wiped out, never, and that he couldn't hold up his head again with such a son, and that as Godfrey wasn't to be flogged he would have to be punished in some even worse way,—but none of us knew what yet. It was too dreadful for words. Godfrey told me all about it. Mr. Maphson went away that very morning, immediately after breakfast, but he didn't come down to it, so perhaps he didn't have any, and Maria has been almost at home ever since, and Papa has hardly spoken to anyone. The Dean has been looking very grave. I don't know what would have happened if it hadn't been for General Marchmont, who got up a craquer tomorrow yesterday, which put us into better spirits, as we had to make the arrangements about it, it is to be the American kind—everyone will play everyone else, and the one who wins most games will get a prize from the General. Papa said that Godfrey wasn't to join, as he wasn't fit to associate with the others, which is a queer pity. Poor Godfrey is in such dreadful disgrace, and I am very sorry for him. I suppose it was a frightfully wicked thing to do, but the curious thing is he doesn't seem at all wicked, and I really do believe I've looked at him since I've ever been before. I talked to him for quite a long time yesterday before dinner. I went into the morning room, and he was there, so I began to say how sorry I was. But before I'd said very much he turned round and walked towards the window, and then I saw that he was crying. I hardly knew what to do, so I went on talking for a little, and at last I threw my arms round his neck and kissed him a good many times, which seemed to comfort him although he began to cry harder than ever
