

Is there a place for epidemiology in nursing?

Whitehead D (2000) Is there a place for epidemiology in nursing? Nursing Standard, 14, 42, 35-39. Date of acceptance: April 27 2000.

Abstract

Background Epidemiological research is seen by many to have immense value in helping to determine the health of populations and in helping to plan and determine health service policy. Despite this, it seems to be poorly understood and greatly underused by the nursing profession. Conclusion Epidemiological studies can potentially offer considerable benefits to the way nurses incorporate health-related practices into their professional role. Research also offers a valuable opportunity for the nursing profession to become more active in helping to determine health policy issues. This article explores the nature of the dilemmas surrounding nursing and epidemiology and argues that nursing might be better served by a more proactive role in this valuable research discipline.

Introduction

Epidemiology is a scientific research discipline concerned with observing, measuring and analysing health-related occurrences in human populations (Last 1995, Trichopoulos 1996). Mawner and Kramer (1985) suggest that epidemiological studies can be applied to all diseases, conditions and health-related events. Other authors point to its wider relevance in discussing its impact on planning and evaluating health services, rationalising resources, prioritising health care and formulating health promotion strategies (Donaldson and Donaldson 1993, Katz 1997, Lupton 1995, Sinclair 1999).

It is no longer seen purely as the scientific study of epidemics. These viewpoints appear to indicate that this research approach would be of benefit and interest to the nursing profession and that, whether we are aware of it or not, epidemiological studies do affect nursing practice profoundly. The value of epidemiology in serving the interests of the public (Donaldson and Donaldson 1993, Levine and Lilienfeld 1987, McBean 1992) is not in question in this account. The questions raised in this article are:

- To what degree are epidemiological perspectives currently used in nursing?
- What dilemmas does it pose for nurses?
- How can nursing move forward in establishing itself as a contributor in this area of research?

The impact of epidemiology: an overview

The scope of epidemiology, its range of designs and impact on healthcare formation and reformation have been immense. Many healthcare-related strategies and policies that have influenced the practice of nurses over the past century or so have been established as a consequence of epidemiological study and investigation (McBean 1992).

Historically, the impact of epidemiology on the health of the nation has been long-standing and far-reaching. Its origins can loosely be traced to the time of Hippocrates (460-377 BC) who, as a physician, attempted to investigate the occurrence of disease on a rational basis (Valanis 1992).

In Britain, its formative roots can be traced back to isolated studies of specific diseases in the early 19th century. These investigations culminated in the celebrated study by John Snow (referred to as the father of epidemiology) who, around the 1850s, observed patterns of incidence of a cholera outbreak in central London. As a result of his recording of the incidence of cholera and mortality in the area, Snow was able to isolate the cause of the cholera epidemic and attribute it to a communal water-pump in Broad Street, Soho. After removing the pump handle, Snow observed that new cases of cholera in the area ceased and the epidemic declined.

Although dismissed by most scientists of the time, this finding and others related to disease and the environment had a profound effect on the formation of the public health movement and the early Public Health Acts of 1848 and 1875. These acts emphasised environmental change, largely through the enforcement of societal restructuring.

Similar investigations led to other significant public health legislation, such as the Clean Air Act of 1956, where the increased incidence of deaths of London residents over the winter months was attributed to increased concentrations of sulphur dioxide from burning fossil fuel products
