

Short writing tasks (also called expanded answers) found in many written in-class and out-of-class exams, laboratory reports, case studies, annotations of literature, and computer program documentation assignments constitute the most common type of writing across all disciplines and courses. Furthermore, short writing assignments are significantly more common in undergraduate than graduate courses and in in-class than out-of-class assignments.

English Composition Writing Tasks

English composition instruction often provides the model for teaching writing in EAPs. According to the Hale et al. (1996) study, short writing tasks are far less common in English than in social or natural sciences (29% of all in-class assignments vs. 53% and 79%, respectively). On the other hand, out-of-class essays are required in 94% of all English courses, for example, compared with 53% in social and 47% in natural sciences. Among the assignment types, summaries and unstructured writing genre defined as free writing, journal entries, or notes, all which consist of writing down one's thoughts and experiences, are found almost exclusively in English courses, as well as twice as many assigned library research papers as in other disciplines. Major papers of 5 to 10 pages in length are assigned in 41% of English courses and only rarely in social science courses. Similarly, 1- to 5-page essays are required in 82% of English courses versus 39% of those in social sciences and 21% in physical/natural sciences.

FEATURES OF ACADEMIC GENRE AND TEXT

Research into various types of discourse and text (Biber, 1988; Biber, Johansson, Leech, Conrad, & Finegan, 1999; Swales, 1990a) showed explicitly and clearly that academic discourse and text are constructed differently than other types of text, such as fiction, news reportage, or personal correspondence. In fact, Swales (1990a) identified what he called "the academic discourse community" (p. 5), which prescribes somewhat rigid forms of discourse construction and organization combined with similarly inflexible expectations of vocabulary and grammar uses. Biber et al. (1999) examined a large corpus of specific microfeatures of texts in diverse spoken and written genres, and their findings are described in a 1,200-page volume. Their analysis includes the cross-genre uses of nouns, determiners, pronouns, verb tenses, and semantic classes of verbs, adjectives, adverbs, and clauses. Textual uses of practically all features indicate that written academic text is markedly distinct from many other types of texts, such as personal narrative, conversation, and even academic lectures.

Other corpus studies investigated frequencies of use of various lexical and syntactic features employed in academic and other types of text to eluci-
