

The CAGED Sequence - Diatonics

When joined end to end, the Diatomic Scalar Forms create a contiguous pattern of notes along the frequency as depicted in the infrared graph. As with the polychromatic, this view is intended as a bridge to enable you to visualize the Scalar Forms and Lead Patterns at levels of the same whole.

In order for a player to make use of the entire range of linear notes, they must again be reorganized to permit fluid motion from one position to another. This enables us to use a variety of techniques and combinations that would not otherwise be possible and also allows for greater access to the fretboard.

The next step is to divide the scores into more playable groupings based on the most regular or symmetrical groupings.

Again, playing to and from the first and last notes in the pentads, will result in a complete fretboard scale form, and will be correct guitar scale playing to and from the Targem will result in a complete scale and will be correct music-wise. Since more notes are available with the diatonic than with the pentatonic, there are also more possible combinations.

There's some benefit in the technical department, also. The discs do provide a physical advantage in the gathering in the way of notes per song. With respect to velocity and picking technique, what was relatively difficult to negotiate because of changing strings after only two notes with the Pentaton Scale Forms, will now be somewhat easier since the distances generally have three notes per string.

Diatonic Lead Patterns

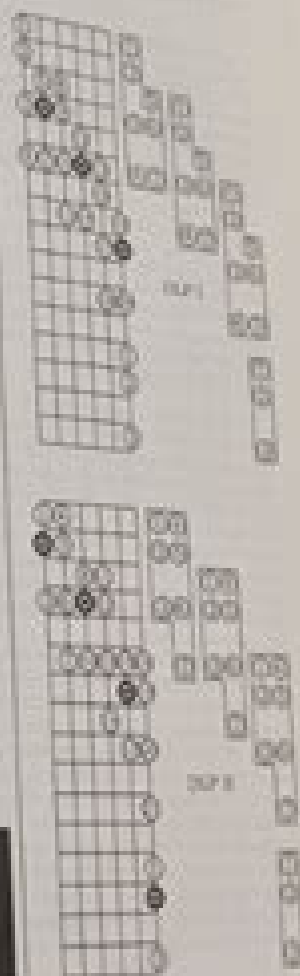

The two basic (distinct) Lead Patterns are shown in the left hand column. On the right side, each has been divided into small sub-groups. The sub-groups illustrate in three repeating seven note patterns of which each lead pattern is composed. To which each series to three complete octaves, thus more notes have been added to each line where the pattern repeats again, showing your difference from the real estate world.

[illegible]

in developing each Diatonic Lead pattern and its variations, we are looking for an inherent symmetry in our choice of sub-groupings. The ones that are easiest to play and remember will get the most use. Instant Lead Patterns I and II correspond with the Pre-synthetic Lead Patterns, naturally when the pre-synthesizers have five notes in each sub-group, the Diatonics have seven. When DLP I and II are combined, as with the pre-synthesizers, they account for every note in the five basic Diatonic Scale Forms.

The numbers in the left hand graphs are the values in order ascending, and the numbers in the right column show the sum of each sub-group.

The Scale Patterns are irregular along patterns in a single position. The Local Patterns are regular along patterns in various positions.
