

Use good English, write complete sentences, and organize your solutions

You must make it easy for the exam reader to follow your line of reasoning. Don't expect the reader to fill in the blanks for you and make inferences about your intent—it doesn't work that way. Always answer the question completely, but don't ramble. While some rambling won't hurt you as long as the correct answer is in there, you will be docked if you say something statistically inaccurate or something that contradicts an otherwise correct answer. Quit while you're ahead. Remember the amount of space provided for a given question does not necessarily mean that you should fill the space. Answers should be complete but concise. Don't fill the space just because it's there. When you've completely answered the question, move on.
