

David Lloyd George was often the moderating influence between Wilson's idealism and France's anti-German vengefulness. He valued freedom of action for Britain and didn't want to commit the nation to any alliance or guarantee of action, saw Russia as a major threat and a stable Germany as protection against Russian aggression.

Traditional British foreign policy objectives

- Elimination of the German fleet as a threat to the British empire
- Concrete plans to defeat German attempts at European domination
- Return to normal European trade relations
