Daniel Abraham,2021-02-11 Golden retrievers descend from the Staghounds where they were used primarily as hunting dogs. The Staghounds were used to retrieve birds from water or land because they hunted groundhounds in ponds and marshes. As guns were introduced, they were able to bring back birds from farther distances. To develop the retriever, the Baron of Tweedmouth, Dudley Marjoribank, crossed a Tweed water spaniel with a yellow-colored retriever. The fur was then used in further breeding with lines including the Irish terrier, bloodhound, and St. John's water dog, and black retriever. Historical records through the late 19th century showcasing the development of a dog with a flat mouth for retrieving game but without terrier and terrier-like traits in England were given by The Kennel Club of England in 1911. During the early 20th century, golden retrievers were introduced to North America by a hunting dog named the golden retriever, which was bred by the American Kennel Club in 1925. When the AKC debuted the AKC Obedience Champion title in 1977, the first three dogs to earn the designation were golden retrievers. Prized golden retrievers include those won by Grand Champion R. N. Golden retrievers grow rapidly and should be on a low-calorie puppy diet that will keep them from growing too fast and prevent their risk of bone disorders. An adult golden retriever should be fed two meals a day of up to 15 cups of dry dog food. It is better to measure their food and reduce it rather than leaving food out for free feeding. The amount needed for an individual dog depends on its size, activity level, and other factors. You should always provide fresh water. Be sure to monitor your dog's weight as obesity will shorten your pet's lifespan and reduce their health. If uncertain, discuss with your veterinarian. Get recommended nutritional feeding schedules, amount, feed type, food, and exercise to keep dogs healthy.
