

National Health Service's Reforms by New Labour Party

Topic: Health & Medicine | Words: 2449 | Pages: 7

Introduction

The publication of The New NHS White Paper in the autumn of 1997 set the framework for the new government's approach to the NHS in England. This included six key principles for the NHS: to ensure that the NHS remains a genuinely national service and ensure that all people had equal access to high-quality healthcare services; to ensure that the standards set in healthcare are made a priority at the local level; to get the NHS to work in partnership with local authorities; to drive efficiency through a rigorous approach to performance by cutting bureaucracy; to shift focus onto the quality of care so that excellence is guaranteed to all patients and finally to rebuild public confidence in the NHS as a public service accountable to patients and shaped by their views (Watkins et al 2003, p. 6).

This plan by the government of Tony Blair in 1997 radically reformed the health service in England, the NHS, since its establishment in 1948. The plan ensured "improved standards of care, an end to the "postcode lottery" of care, more investment in staff development, increased partnership working between the NHS and social care and a renewed commitment to improving the health of the nation" (Butler 2003, p. 1). These goals were sought to be achieved through an ambitious "modernization" program that would involve recruiting thousands of more medical personnel and investing heavily in building new hospitals, GP surgeries, and medical equipment. Thesis: The current NHS reforms of New Labor though implemented with the best of intentions have met
