

Fuzhou Protestants and the Making of a Modern China, 1857–1927. By RYAN DUNCH. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2001. xxi, 293 pp. $35.00 (cloth).

This is not only a fine first book by a young scholar, but it is one of the best books on modern China I have read in some time. It makes a significant contribution in at least three areas: Chinese Protestant history, the background and dynamics of the 1911 Revolution, and the failed attempt at political pluralism of the first decade and a half of the Republic. Originally a Yale dissertation written under Jonathan Spence, it shows a maturity and depth of conception and execution characteristic of a seasoned scholar. The research is thorough, the documentation convincing, and the writing style polished. The volume is further enhanced by a number of well-chosen photographs. Finally, the price is very reasonable for today's market.

This work provides a fresh interpretation of Chinese Protestant Christianity and the role of Chinese Christians from the mid-nineteenth century until the 1920s. By covering about seven decades, and by grounding his discussion extensively in Chinese sources (many obtained during productive research stays in Fuzhou), Dunch is able to show how the Fuzhou Protestants pursued their own agenda despite the continuing presence of the foreign missionaries. Indeed, in this book, "missionaries appear only peripherally . . . because in most instances they were peripheral to the day-to-day life and religious practice of Chinese Protestants" (p. 4). He also traces the remarkable social and economic mobility of the Fuzhou Protestant community during these decades, so that by the early 1900s, several of its leaders were respected and highly influential in the top ranks of Fuzhou society and politics. An issue not definitively addressed by other scholars is the role of Protestantism in mobility for Chinese women. Dunch's own unambiguous conclusion is that "the impact of the Protestant churches on the life possibilities of Chinese women was enormous" (p. 44).

One of Dunch's major points is that the Protestants of Fuzhou were not "alienated," but remained fully rooted in Chinese culture and society: "Conversion to Christianity was not a simple repudiation of Chinese culture in the minds of Chinese Protestants" (p. 15). Both conversion experiences and later narratives of Christian identity were fully understandable in Chinese cultural terms. Dunch also convincingly disposes of the overly simplistic impression that Christians benefitted from legal interference on their behalf under the treaty system. He makes an extensive analysis of the practical ways in which Christian communities actually functioned in locally competitive arenas during these decades. In fact, he shows that there was often more tension between Chinese believers and the missionaries than between the former and their fellow Chinese. He gives several examples of "the kind of fundamental difference of perception that could arise between missionaries and Chinese Protestants" (p. 60).

In his discussion of the place of the Fuzhou Protestant community and its leaders in the rapidly changing political currents of the post-1900 period, Dunch portrays the Protestant leadership (with their educational credentials and status in modern professions) as fully accepted partners in the local coalition of progressive reformers and modernizing elites. This prominent civic role of Protestants included participation in the provincial assembly in 1909–1910, the Revolution of 1911, and the local political leadership of the early Republic. In this discussion, covering chapters 2–4, Dunch gives us, among other insights, a fresh look at the importance of the provincial assemblies ("a startling and far-reaching innovation," p. 91), and a description of the remarkable role of the YMCA in Fuzhou civic life between 1900 and 1920 (chapter 5 has further analysis of the YMCA, making it one of the book's central themes).

The Oxford History of Protestant Dissenting Traditions, Volume IV Jehu J. Hanciles, 2019-03-07. The five-volume Oxford History of Protestant Dissenting Traditions series is governed by a motif of migration out of England. It first traces organized church traditions that arose in England as Dissenters distanced themselves from a state church defined by diocesan episcopacy, the Book of Common Prayer, the Thirty-Nine Articles, and royal supremacy but then follows those traditions as they spread beyond England and also traces newer traditions that emerged downstream in other parts of the world from earlier forms of Dissent. Secondly, it does the same for the doctrines, church practices, stances toward state and society, attitudes toward Scripture, and characteristic patterns of organization that also originated in earlier English Dissent but that have often defined a trajectory of influence independent of ecclesiastical organizations. Volume IV examines the globalization of dissenting traditions in the twentieth century. During this period

Protestant Dissent achieved not only its widest geographical reach but also the greatest genealogical distance from its point of origin Covering Africa Asia the Middle East America Europe Latin America and the Pacific this collection provides detailed examination of Protestant Dissent as a globalizing movement Contributors probe the radical shifts and complex reconstruction that took place as dissenting traditions encountered diverse cultures and took root in a multitude of contexts many of which were experiencing major historical change at the same time This authoritative overview unambiguously reveals that Dissent was transformed as it travelled religious variety on a scale unimagined in 1900 Today the full range of faiths and religious practices from all continents are present in Europe and North America Christians are challenged to come to terms with this changed situation These developments have intensified religious plurality Christians all over the world are being urged to understand and engage with this new situation This volume highlights this new reality and specifies some sources for engagement not least among them the Judeo Christian scriptures fundamental to all Christianities that emerged out of religious plural contexts On the basis of their faith in the Triune God disclosed in this text all followers of Jesus Christ must interact with these opportunities in today's radically context sensitive world
