Environmental Policies And Employment:

Employment Effects of Environmental Policies - Evidence From Firm-Level Data Mr. Adil Mohommad, 2021-05-14

The employment impact of environmental policies is an important question for policy makers. We examine the effect of increasing the stringency of environmental policy across a broad set of policies on firms' labor demand in a novel identification approach using Worldscope data from 31 countries on firm level CO₂ emissions. Drawing on evidence from as many as 5300 firms over 15 years and the OECD environmental policy stringency EPS index, it finds that high emission intensity firms reduce labor demand upon impact as EPS is tightened, whereas low emission intensity firms increase labor demand, indicating a reallocation of employment. Moreover, tightening EPS during economic contractions appears to have a positive effect on employment. Other things equal, quantifications exercises show modest positive net changes in employment for market based policies and modest negative net changes for non market policies, mainly emission quantity regulations and for the combined aggregate EPS. Within market based policies, the percent decline in employment in high emission firms correspondingly the increase in low emission firms for a unit change in a policy index is smallest, largest for trading schemes, green certificates and white certificates, although stringency is not comparable across indices. Finally, the employment effects of EPS are not persistent. Environment and Jobs Skip Laitner, 1995 Employment and Environment European
