

In contrast to a pidgin a Creole is often defined as a pidgin that becomes the first. Language of a new generation of speakers. Thus a Creole arises when a pidgin becomes a mother tongue. In the course of several generations pidgin can become more complex, especially if it develops into the mother tongue of a group of speakers. This stage is called creolisation. The example of a Creole language is Haitian Creole which is French based but widely different from standard French.
