

Environmental Policy and the Direction of Technical Change*

Mads Greaker[‡], Tom-Reiel Heggedal[‡] and Knut Einar Rosendahl[§]

Abstract

Should governments direct R&D from "dirty" into "clean" technologies? How important is this compared to carbon pricing? We inquire into this, introducing two novelties compared to recent literature. We introduce decreasing returns to R&D, and allow future carbon taxes to influence current R&D decisions. Our results suggest that governments should prioritize clean R&D. Dealing with major environmental problems requires R&D to shift to clean technology. However, with most researchers working with clean technology, both productivity spillovers and future risks of being replaced increase. Consequently, the wedge between private and social value of an innovation is largest for clean technologies.
