Workshop on Problems and Prospects of Rural Development in Ethiopia ,1992 Small-scale Irrigation Dams, Agricultural Production, and Health Lire Ersado,2005 Households with poor health are less likely to adopt productivity enhancing as well as resource conserving technologies which are crucial for achieving the ultimate goal of sustainable agricultural development The ensuing sickness has also led to reduction in labor allocation to off farm activities The findings underline the importance of weighing beforehand the magnitude of potential economic benefits against health costs of water development programs The overall evidence however suggests that carefully designed irrigation dams could significantly improve agricultural production and food security particularly in areas where waterborne diseases pose negligible risk to health or can be cost effectively controlled Abstract Achieving food system resilience & equity in the era of global environmental change Albie F. Patterns of agricultural production among male and female holders Kasa, Leulseggged,Warner, James,Kieran, Caitlin,2015-12-08 Gender inequities present a major barrier to increased agricultural production and food security in Ethiopia However a lack of nationally representative sex disaggregated data and analysis hinder the development and implementation of evidence based policies This report aims to contribute to filling this gap by presenting a gender analysis of the Ethiopian Central Statistics Agency s Agricultural Sample Survey AgSS data collected between 2010 and 2013 The analysis reveals clear gender gaps between male and female holders in terms of human capital natural capital financial capital agricultural input use and participation in crop production and livestock husbandry Specifically female holders are less educated have less family labor own and manage less land and are less likely to cultivate rented land compared to male holders Concurrently female holders have limited access to extension and advisory services and therefore to knowledge and information concerning best agronomic practices Compared to male holders female holders are less likely to cultivate commercial and economically valuable crops This difference substantially contributes to the gender resource gap since these crops generate a higher market value than traditional staple crops Moreover a significantly lower proportion of female holders reported ownership of livestock especially oxen and equines which are the primary sources of draught power for plowing and transportation in rural Ethiopia Overall this report identifies significant differences in the patterns of agricultural production of male and female holders in Ethiopia and calls for closing these gender gaps because it would yield enormous benefits at the individual household and national levels The report also puts forward policy priorities for prospective interventions
