

Roosevelt Red Wares and Salado Polychrome

Salado polychrome ceramics, a variety of Roosevelt Red Ware, were the most abundant decorated ware of the Classic period (A.D. 1275-1450) southern Southwest (Houk 1992; Simon 1996). Types including Pinto, Gila, and Tonto, indicate the presence and influence of the Salado culture across the region — a range extending from the Agua Fria river in central Arizona to the Rio Grande in New Mexico, north to the Little Colorado River, and south into the northern Mexican states of Sonora and Chihuahua. The initial manufacture of Salado polychrome ceramics corresponds with the development of the Salado platform mound communities in the Tonto Basin of central Arizona, but latter varieties achieved such a wide range of trade, manufacture, and usage that archaeologist Patricia Crown (1994) suggests the designs represent the iconography of a regional cult, and not simply the preferred decorated ware of a single ethnic group.

Roosevelt Red Ware

Roosevelt Red Wares were typically manufactured using a coil-and-scrpe method. Clay mixed with either granite, diabase (dolerite), or a mixture of the two, was rolled into thin coils that were then layered atop each other to form the pot (Simon 1996). The sides of the coils were then scraped together using a piece of gourd — an action that served to compress, thin, and smooth the walls of the vessel. The pottery surface was then sanded smooth with a piece of sandstone, slipped, polished, and then decorated before firing in an oxidizing, or open fire, atmosphere (Simon 1996).

The variety of paint colors common to Roosevelt Red Ware pottery derived from mineral and organic sources. Red paint, for example, was made from hematite, while white paints derived from kaolin, a pure clay with no iron inclusions. Black paint was commonly manufactured from iron or manganese (mineral-based), charred organic materials, or organic extracts such as that resulting from boiling down beeweed (carbon-based).

Although Salado and Salado-style polychrome ceramics are found across a large area in the Southwest, they were produced at a local, household level with local resources. Likewise, these wares are found in a variety of contexts, including household, communal, and burial environments. Vessel form and painted designs vary from type to type and through time, with evidence suggesting that some variation was also the result of specialization in ceramic manufacture by individual communities (Simon 1996). Identification of these specialized communities and the specific characteristics of locally manufactured wares has provided evidence for complex intraregional social networks in the Classic period Southwest.

Tonto Basin Salado Polychrome Pottery

Tonto Basin polychrome ceramics encompass three distinct styles of red, white, and black painted pottery. Manufacture of the earliest Salado painted wares — Pinto Polychrome and Pinto Black-on-Red — began around A.D. 1275, during the Roosevelt phase. Gila and Tonto polychromes developed later, appearing early in the 1300s, during the Gila phase (Simon 1996).

Pinto Polychrome

Pinto Polychrome was produced between A.D. 1270 and 1300. Typically the exterior of the vessel had a red slip and an interior white slip with black organic or mineral paint designs. Designs were geometric made using lines, curves, and rectangles. Pinto Polychrome had the most restricted distribution of all three wares that extended only from east-central Arizona to southeastern Arizona (Houk 1992; Simon et al. 1998).
