

important for the animal and its immunity to infection. Two chapters are devoted to the consequences of virus-induced changes at the cell surface. One by Burns & Allison describes the various host- and viral-coded antigens on the surface of infected cells and how they alter the cells reactions to lectins, to capping, to antigenic modulations and describe viral-induced alteration in the expression of host-coded antigens on the surface of infected cells. The other chapter by R. V. Blanden et al. describes, with the aid of recent experimental work in his laboratory and several Tables, the T-cell recognition of virus-infected cells. They develop the theme of the need for shared histocompatibility antigens between the target cell (virus-infected cell) and effector cell (immunized cell) before the infected cell is recognized as altered and subsequently destroyed. There are two possible explanations for this phenomenon, one that the T-cell is recognizing 'altered self' (mediated by the virus genome) or that it is in fact recognizing two components, namely (i) a viral-coded product and (ii) cell-coded histocompatibility antigens. Their work leads them to the former explanation.

The final chapter by Lindenmann is rather more philosophical than the others and is concerned with host components in membrane-containing RNA viruses. Host proteins are completely eliminated from the site of virus budding and only lipids and some antigenic glycolipids such as the Forssman and blood-group-A antigens are incorporated into the viral membrane. Lindenmann points to the immunological implications of viruses having antigenic host components.

The book is as up-to-date in its research material and references (which are ubiquitous for each review) as any book can be, so it will be useful to research workers in membrane biochemistry, virology and to a new group of scientists to which the book is geared—those molecular biologists, biophysicists and virologists who are prepared to collaborate and bring their own expertise to the adsorbing subject of virus infection and the cell surface.

Handbook of Teratology, Volume 1: General Principles and Etiology

JAMES G. WILSON and F. CLARKE FRASER

Plenum Press, New York and London, 1977, pp. 476, $54.00

Teratology has moved a long way since medieval times when deformed children were either revered as gods or put to death, depending on what notions as to their causation were prevalent at the time. Volume 1, General Principles and Etiology, in this four-volume series, Handbook of Teratology, is a comprehensive attempt to show just how far forward the science has moved from the days of the 16th Century when, as the opening chapter tells us, the shape of the bed used for cohabitation was proposed as an aetiological theory of birth defects. Some would doubtless say not very far forward since, as Wilson points out, the causes of 65–70% of all human developmental defects remain unknown.

If this book achieves one thing, it is to firmly dispel an impression the casual reader might gain from the literature, in the wake of the thalidomide tragedy, that drugs are a major cause of developmental abnormalities. The topics covered also include radiations, infections, nutritional, metabolic and endocrine imbalances, environmental chemicals and pollutants, and extremes of temperature. If these separately do not provide all the answers, as surely they do not, then there is a thoughtful chapter on interactions and multiple causes of abnormalities. Biochemists who feel they hold the key to all life's medical mysteries will find plenty for their comfort here; as Fraser says, there has been considerably more progress at the structural than at the biochemical level, though the latter, by identifying underlying mechanisms of aberrant development, must be important for future prevention.
