The paper discusses various environmental and economic effects of international trade agreements. It notes that while trade liberalization can lead to increased economic growth and employment, it can also result in environmental degradation and the loss of local jobs. The paper argues that trade agreements should be designed to take into account the needs of the environment and the welfare of the people. It suggests that trade agreements should include provisions for environmental protection and the creation of new jobs. The paper also discusses the importance of monitoring the effects of trade agreements and making adjustments as needed. It concludes that trade agreements can be a powerful tool for promoting economic growth and environmental protection, but they must be designed and implemented carefully.

A direct causal inference can be made if a change in the prevalence of a disease is associated with a change in the prevalence of a risk factor. For example, the prevalence of breast cancer has increased in the United States since 1970, and the prevalence of obesity has also increased. This suggests a causal relationship between obesity and breast cancer. However, this is not a direct causal inference because there are many other factors that could be associated with both obesity and breast cancer, such as diet, physical activity, and genetics.
