Experience and Brain Development Notes:

Mark Rosenzweig Rat Study (1962): They raised some rats in solitary confinement, and then raised some in a communal playground. When they later analyzed the rats' brain, they found the rats living in enriched environments usually developed a heavier and thicker brain cortex. He repeated this study several times before publishing their findings. The enriched environment literally increased brain power.

After 60 days in the enriched environment:

- The rats' brain weight increased 10%
- The number of synapse connections grew by 20%

In humans, lack of stimulation can slow brain and a person's cognitive development. Stimulation by touch also benefits babies. "Handled" infants develop faster neurologically and gain more weight rapidly. Those who had skin-to-skin contact with their parents sleep better and experience less stress.

Introduction: "From conception onward, we are the product of a cascade of interactions between our genetics and our environment." "Our genes affect how people react to and influence us and they affect our familial environment. Its more nature vs nurture than versus."

Okay, Environments trigger gene activity and our traits can provoke certain responses in other people.

Example: An outgoing and attention-seeking baby will probably attract more attention and from getting it will maintain those traits that bring attention.

"Thus, a child's impulsivity and aggression may evoke an angry response from a parent or teacher, who reacts warmly to well-behaved children in the family or classroom. In such cases, the child's nature and the parents' nurture interact."

Brain maturation creates a lot of neural connections. Our experiences that happen throughout senses will activate and strengthen certain neural pathways that are frequently traveled. But less traveled paths disappear. The most traveled neural pathways will also be broadened. This is called the pruning process, and it results in a great loss of unemployed connections.

Early childhood learning is extremely important. With the extra connections, little kids can easily grasp concepts of grammar and language, but lacking any exposure to language will cause one the inability of its mastery. If they lack visual exposure, they will never be able to achieve normal perception. Without stimulation the synapses and cells used for that task will die.

Brain development doesn't end in childhood, because of neuroplasticity. Our neural tissues are constantly changing and reorganizing in response to new experiences.

Credit and Blame Attributed to Parents Notes:

Freudian psychology encouraged the ideas of blaming schizophrenia or asthma on "bad mothering." Believing that parents shape their children kind of like a potter to clay. Many people praise/blame parents for their children's actions. This makes for a volatile environment for raising children.

Is there any truth to blaming parents? Do toxic parents create negative traits in children, are children who fail faults on the parents? Are parents more like potters or more like gardeners?

Parents matter. But the effects are more prominent in extreme cases: an abused child is more likely to become abusive. The power of family is very prominent in academic and vocational success as well.

"The power of the family environment also appears in the remarkable academic and vocational successes of many children of people who leave their home countries, such as those of refugees who find war-torn Vietnam and Cambodia—successes attributed to close-knit, supportive, even demanding families"

Asian American and European Americans often differ in their parenting skills. An Asian American mother may push her kids to do well, in ways European Americans may seem as undermining the child's motivation.

"All parents—whether biological or adoptive—feel enormous satisfaction in their children's successes or guilt and shame over their failures... They wonder where they went wrong with the child who is repeatedly in trouble."

In personality measurements, environmental differences from the womb onward account for less than 10% of children's differences. "We would essentially be the same person if we had been adopted at birth and raised in a different family."

"So, knowing that children's personalities are not easily sculpted by parental nurture, perhaps parents can relax and love their children for who they are."

Peer Influence on Children:

Peer influence accounts for other types of nurturing experiences. Kids are prone to wanting to fit in with groups.
