Abstract

Kangrang, A., Prasanchum, H., Hormwichian, R., Techarungruengsakul, R., Ngamsert, R., Phookinghin, N., & Wangthken, J. (2019). Improvement of water management project by correcting irrigation water requirement in farmer participation and optimization. Bulgarian Journal of Agricultural Science, 25(5), 852–863

This study explored water resource management in an irrigation project in Yasothon Province, Thailand in order to improve the water resource management system. The Huay Sabag and Huay Ling Jone Irrigation Schemes pilot projects were studied by field observations, interviewing stakeholders and collecting data. Data were collecting about water requirements, allocation and land use and then corrected using farmer participation. The improvement of water resource management was achieved by improving reservoir rule curves that provide decisions concerning release of water following the corrected water requirement. The results revealed that monthly water requirements corrected by farmer participation are less than existing water demand and that the newly obtained rule curves of both reservoirs provided more reserve stored water for irrigation water requirement than the previous rule curves.

Introduction

Water is essential for human and animal survival. However, flood and draught are still classical water problems. There are many challenges and problems that remain unresolved including poor quality irrigation distribution, lack of incentives for stakeholders and low efficiency in reservoir operation etc. It seems that the above issue of stakeholders in water management is the aspect of prime importance for sustainable development. A review and analysis of participatory irrigation management reflected many problematic aspects, such as the level of stakeholder participation, sources of finance and water requirement estimation. Nowadays, stakeholders' involvement in water resources management is seen as an ongoing process to promote efficiency of water resources management for sustainable development (Cuesta & Rañola, 2009; Molobela & Sinha, 2011). Stakeholders need to participate in water management to effectively integrate the goals of efficiency, sustainability and equity for all sections. Supporting stakeholders in managing their water resources to make choices and to reach a common understanding on sharing water is the basis on which stakeholders should seek a well-informed decision (Chenoweth, et al., 2002). To make the transition to more sustainable water management, most analysts recommend managing water based on river basins and increasing stakeholders' participation in water management (Wester et al., 2003). There are great challenges in a transition to participatory decision-making in water systems management, especially regarding public participation (Song et al., 2011). Effective public participation is the key factor to improve the
