Developing Test Procedures for Measuring Stored Thermal Energy in Firefighter Protective Clothing, 2004 This research studied stored thermal energy in fire fighter s turnout systems It developed a novel laboratory apparatus and test protocols for measuring the contribution of both transmitted and discharged stored energy on thermal protective performance It examined the effects of thermal exposure conditions as well as material variables and applied moisture on thermal energy stored in firefighter turnout materials exposed to heat intensities ranging from 0.06 to 0.50 cal cm<sup>2</sup> sec This research provides a useful preliminary basis for further development of laboratory test methods to measure phenomenon associated with the discharge of stored thermal energy from materials used in the construction of firefighter turnouts It demonstrates the complexity of factors affecting these phenomena in turnout materials

Comparisons of Two Test Methods for Evaluating the Radiant Protective Performance of Wildland Firefighter Protective Clothing Materials Kyle Watson, Roger Barker, Alex Hummel, 2016 Firefighter personal protective equipment PPE is often worn in radiant thermal exposures that are significantly lower than the high intensity flash fire conditions in which they are tested and certified This is particularly true in the case of wildland firefighting where the California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection has identified the reasonable maximum exposure for their normal work conditions as less than 10 kW m<sup>2</sup> This research will review the testing methodologies used to evaluate the thermal protective performance of meta aramid fabric materials utilized in lower intensity radiant heat exposures The current standard Radiant Protective Performance test method possesses inherent limitations that greatly affect the results of the test at lower flux exposures To improve on these limitations this research has made use of the ASTM

F2731 test platform this is a new bench scale testing platform that uses water cooled thermal sensor technology and an advanced skin burn injury model to provide a more accurate prediction for burn injuries resulting from the transmission of radiant heat This study proves that the new test method and platform are repeatable and can differentiate among meta aramid fabrics of differing weights
