

CHAPTER XXXIV

JAPAN AND KOREA

After the Russo-Japanese War.—There were four major topics of interest in the years immediately following the war between Russia and Japan: (1) The development of Japan's control in Korea; (2) the international rivalries which arose in Manchuria; (3) the new reform movement in China; and (4) the post-bellum economic and political readjustments in Japan. Each of these topics will now be considered in order, but care must be taken to correlate events which were in progress contemporaneously.

Japanese Interests in Korea.—Although Russia's conduct in both Korea and Manchuria brought on the war with Japan, the latter country was far more concerned with Korea than with the Manchurian aspects of Russia's advance. If Russia would promise to respect the integrity of China and recognize Japan's special interests in Korea, Japan was quite ready to give her a free hand in the development of her railway and economic interests in Manchuria. Korea had been of vital importance to Japan since the first days of Meiji. Her interests there were based upon the following considerations: (1) The proximity of Korea, less than 50 miles from the nearest Japanese territory and only 120 miles from Shinanoseki. (2) The continued maladministration of Korea, which was, in 1905, without doubt the worst governed state in Asia. (3) The necessity of preventing any strong power from controlling or taking possession of Korea. This necessity will be appreciated by Englishmen who found in Belgium a casus belli in the World War, and by Americans whose Senate, in 1912, passed the following resolution:

When any harbor or other place in the American continent is so situated that the occupation thereof for naval or military purposes might threaten the communications or the safety of the United States, the government of the United States could not see, without grave concern, the possession of such harbor or other place by any corporation or association which has such relations to another government as to give that government practical power of control for naval or military purposes.¹

(4) The necessity of having access to Korea for supplies of food and raw materials and as a market for Japanese manufactures. Japan, until 1905, had repeatedly asserted her policy as seeking the independence and reform of Korea. Because China refused to recognize this independence and persistently blocked the efforts of Japan for reform, a war between Japan and China resulted. This war was from China a recognition of Korean independence, but scarcely had Japan begun her efforts for reform, when her influence was destroyed, when the murder of the Korean queen, and the influence of Russia became supreme. A second war resulted, this time to drive out a far more dangerous rival than China had been. And having entered upon two wars because of the inability of Korea to defend herself, Japan very properly insisted that this should not happen again. She intended to take such measures that her influence in Korea should be supreme, but she still proclaimed her policy of independence, reform, and the openness.²

Development of Japanese Control.—A Japanese expeditionary force landed at Chemulpo on the night of February 8-9, 1904, and proceeded at once to Seoul. On the 22d a protocol was signed between the two countries which established a modified protectorate of Japan in Korea. Korea was to place full confidence in the government of Japan and adopt the advice of the latter in regard to the improvement of the administration. Japan, on the other hand, would assure the safety and repose of the imperial house of Korea. She also definitely guaranteed the independence and territorial integrity of the Korean empire, and in case it was endangered by a third power or by internal disturbances she would take such necessary measures as the circumstances required, in which

² The relations between Russia and Japan and between Japan and Korea testify to the futility of the latter policy.
