aspect of the human condition Yet stress in its truest form is neither inevitable nor insurmountable It is a biological response that once served our ancestors well in genuinely life threatening situations but now often operates like a car alarm that cannot be turned off alerting us to dangers that exist primarily in our imagination To understand stress is to recognize it as a conversation between our minds and bodies a dialogue that begins in the brain and radiates outward through every system in our physical being When we perceive a threat whether real or imagined immediate or distant our hypothalamus sends urgent signals throughout our nervous system The sympathetic nervous system springs into action releasing a cascade of hormones including adrenaline and cortisol that prepare our bodies for what scientists call the fight or flight response The
