Abstract

The Child and Family Refugee Service at the Tavistock Centre in London has run a series of ‘Tree of Life’ groups for both parents and children in schools. The groups were developed in response to a concern about the majority of psychological treatments, which focus predominantly on vulnerability factors in refugee populations, and the effect that this can have on those they are attempting to help. In addition, these are modelled on western assumptions, which do not adequately take account of culture. The Tree of Life groups have provided an alternative to traditional mental health services, which many refugee families find hard to access because of perceived stigma and lack of knowledge about what is on offer. The groups employed a strength-based narrative methodology, using the tree as a creative metaphor, which enabled parents and children to develop empowering stories about their lives, which were rooted in their cultural and social histories. From this secure base, participants were able to develop shared, culturally congruent solutions to their problems. The groups have been found to benefit parents and children alike, as well as the school communities in which they have taken place.

‘Talking about pride in our country and being a Moslem has made me realise how much this is a source of strength for me.’... ‘Now we have gained strength for ourselves, we want to talk about our children.’
(Mothers from Afghanistan attending a Tree of Life group)

These were the words of two Afghani mothers who had participated in one of the ‘Tree of life’ groups that the Tavistock Centre Child and Family Refugee Service have run for parents and children in schools in the London Borough of Camden. These groups were designed to offer an
