ABSTRACT

Fine-grained, mud-rich turbidite systems primarily occur in basins with a large fluvial input. Depositional models derived from sand-rich turbidite systems are not appropriate because the large volume of mud in fine-grained turbidite systems produces different sediment distribution patterns, geomorphic features, and internal architecture at bed-to-sequence scales. Many of the chapters in this volume demonstrate that understanding fine-grained turbidite systems requires a number of steps and degrees of resolution, very similar to the range of data utilized in the oil industry. Industrial examples include 2-D and 3-D seismic, cores, and well logs. To refine the understanding of a turbidite field, the earth scientist must integrate the most applicable models with subsurface data, outcrop analyses, modern analogs, and experimental results.

INTRODUCTION

The explosion of research efforts focused on submarine fan, or turbidite system, deposits during the 1990s are principally the result of exploration for and the discovery of large hydrocarbon accumulations in fine-grained, mud-rich turbidite systems deposited in passive margin settings (e. g., Brazil, Gulf of Mexico, West Africa, North Sea).

In an effort to maximize exploitation of these deep-water reserves, industry and academia have joined to advance the understanding of sediment transport and depositional processes, sediment distribution patterns, processes of fan construction, and reservoir architecture in fine-grained turbidite systems. This has been accomplished by (1) reexamining numerous outcrop successions with emphasis on sequence stratigraphic concepts and reservoir architectural elements, (2) conducting new experimental studies (e.g., flume) and numerical modeling to investigate sediment gravity flow transport and depositional processes, and (3) cooperative geological-geophysical-engineering studies to achieve integrated definition and characterization of subsurface sand bodies. These studies, which ultimately questioned many paradigms (Shanmugan and Moiola, 1988; Shanmugan, 1999), have demonstrated that fundamental differences exist in where and how deepwater sediments, particularly the sand-grade fractions, are deposited in fine-grained, mud-rich turbidite systems as compared with the more thoroughly studied coarse-grained, sand-rich turbidite systems (Normark et al., 1986).
