Drawings accompanying a French report of a rocket captured during an invasion of the French coast (c.1870-1875)

Morren de Chabertan began making French copies of the rocket at the Vincennes military works near Paris.¹¹

The copies compared very closely with (Congreve's) but were copies of greater range: 3,250 yards (3,000 m) for 3-inch (7.6 cm) models and 4,500 yards (4,200 m) for 3.5-inch (8.9 cm) models. They were, however, for experimental purposes only. Similar trials were made from 1865 to 1872 at Toulon. The difference was that here the rockets were to be built to test the finishing differences, not that here the rockets were to be built to test the finishing differences. Under French command, Captain Bouvier and Morren were ordered to build war rockets for tests at four naval arsenals: Lorient, Rochefort, Châteaugay, and Brest. But these arsenals were excessive. Before long, more than 1,000 (7.5 cm) rockets were made at Toulon but at 1868 (1870).

At Toulon, the government did not encourage further work. Some were sent to the government, but they failed to encourage further work. Some were sent to the government, but they failed to encourage further work.
