

A Century of Fisheries Oceanography Tools

Advances in technology have provided fisheries oceanography scientists with better research tools throughout the years. Some tools, like net trawls (a), have not changed significantly over the last 100 years. Shipboard capability, however, has increased exponentially. NOAA's most recently commissioned vessel (May 2014), the Reuben Lasker (b), bears little resemblance to the ships from the early 20th century. It has extensive wet and dry labs onboard, as well as state-of-the-art sensors for observing physical properties of the ocean, marine animal distributions, and meteorological conditions, which allow researchers to maximize every hour spent at sea. Instruments used onboard modern ships to sample ocean properties have evolved from the collection of a single sample to vertical profiles of temperature, salinity, light transmission, dissolved oxygen, pH and other properties, as well the collection of water samples from multiple depths for further analyses (c). Acoustic sensors used to map the distribution of plankton and fish have changed from providing a single beam (d) of information to multiple beams (e) of information. The latest research vessels have low sound signatures to reduce animal reactions to the presence of the ship and enhance the signal-to-noise ratio of a suite of acoustic instruments. Remotely operated vehicles (ROVs) (f) equipped with modern video capability give scientists a better picture of the deep sea without dealing with the confines of enclosure in a manned submersible. Autonomous vehicles such as ocean gliders (g) have allowed researchers to gather information untethered from ships. Hexacopters (h) give a bird's eye view to research. Satellites (i) give oceanographers immediate and global access to surface ocean conditions. All of these technologies combined provide scientists with the best picture we have ever had to understand the complexity of the ocean and its inhabitants.
