

professional librarian, 1410 series, in order for libraries to meet federal information needs,” an opinion that OPM questioned.⁷

FLICC’s paper noted that “for entry level positions the rest of the nation’s library community recruits librarians who possess an American Library Association (ALA)-accredited master’s degree in library science (MLS); however, the MLS is not a mandatory requirement for entry level positions in the federal government.”⁸ FLICC developed a number of arguments in support of requiring the MLS degree rather than a bachelor’s degree, arguments that also reinforce the position that the MLS and MEd are stronger educational tools for a federal librarian than other types of graduate degrees.

For example, FLICC’s position paper enumerated the varied roles of federal librarians within their respective agencies. These roles include administration and maintenance of the library, collection development (including the identification and evaluation of electronic information resources), location and retrieval of requested information, and education and instruction of both library clientele and library staff. The paper illustrated why only “an MLS degreed librarian possessing professional knowledge, skills, and abilities” is qualified to deliver the “required level of performance” for each of these functions.⁹ FLICC’s paper also referenced a report, prepared for the PWG, identifying numerous competency requirements for the various functions performed by librarians and information services providers “that clearly fall at the professional postgraduate level.”¹⁰
