Private employment is closely related with, especially regarding at-home-workers in growing technology-related economies. During these emerging periods, many firms, however, struggle between paid labor and outsourcing technology use in order to maintain capital and management control. Social groups, however, are different in response to at-home workers. According to Kwon, this type of workers is linked with the problem that private firms tend to discriminate against and marginalize them in terms of technology use and technology-related work. But on the other hand, technology-related work is closely linked to the social network and social capital.
