

The Political Economy of Food Price Policy in BANGLADESH

Research Brief No. 14

April 2013

SELIM RAIHAN

Global food price hikes during 2007 and 2008 resulted in a sharp rise in staple food prices in Bangladesh, which in turn led to a significant rise in the number of households falling below the poverty line. On the political front, Bangladesh was run by an unelected and undemocratic “civil” caretaker government, backed by the military, which remained in power until the end of 2008 and undertook several steps to contain price hikes. Some of these policies and programs were effective, and some were not.

Rice is central in the consumption basket.

Food security in Bangladesh is strongly linked to the production, import, and price stability of rice. Bangladesh is a net rice-importing country, but rice imports in Bangladesh have traditionally been erratic, depending on domestic production, which is often affected by natural calamities. Self-sufficiency in rice production has long been a national objective. With expanded cultivation of high-yielding paddy varieties, the once critical dependence on imports has subsided.

Bangladesh has been vulnerable to human-caused and natural calamities that threatened food security.

Since independence in 1971, Bangladesh has faced a number of human-caused and natural calamities that have threatened the food security of poor and marginalized people. These calamities include a famine in 1974, floods in 1987 and 1988, a cyclone in 1991, a flood in 1998, and a cyclone in 2007. The government responded to these crises by supplying food for immediate relief and by helping to coordinate food aid commitments and deliveries. At the same time, as part of its price stabilization strategy, the government encouraged private sector imports, a policy that helped avoid food shortages.

The government adopted various policy measures in response to the food price hike in 2007–2008.

The government undertook a number of initiatives to promote agricultural development. These included a subsidy on fertilizer; a rehabilitation program for people affected by floods and cyclones; endowment funds for agricultural research and development; a subsidy on diesel fuel for small and marginal farmers; cash incentives for exporting agricultural products; rebates on electricity bills for entrepreneurs of agro-based industries; reduced interest rates for loans for the production of pulses, oil seeds, and spices; and distribution of agricultural and rural credit through state-owned commercial banks. Total operative tariffs on rice and wheat were reduced to zero. The annual renewal fee for value-added tax (VAT) registration by commercial importers was withdrawn. The government arranged distribution of food grains through various safety net programs, strengthened distribution of rice and pulses to the poor through BDR's Dal-Bhat program, and increased the coverage and amount of individual grants under social safety net programs. The central bank expanded agricultural credit, facilitated the distribution of subsidies on agricultural inputs, and provided soft loans for new importers of food items.
