Protecting the U.S. Food Supply in a Global Economy Paul A. Hall, 2002 Diligent application of the Hazard Analysis and Critical Control Point HACCP approach is believed by many to provide a comprehensive system for food safety management This belief however is not shared uniformly by all stakeholders Because of the dichotomy of opinion surrounding food safety there is a compelling need for additional dialogue and consensus on this issue The aim of this expert survey instrument is to identify the gaps and the areas of agreement among various stakeholders Two hundred and thirty one survey instruments were received out of three hundred and sixty sent 64 2% response rate to food safety professionals in academia industry federal and state government and consumer protection groups The survey consisted of four parts I A series of statements across the food chain describing the extent to which respondents agree with each statement II Rank order priority ratings and degree of satisfaction dissatisfaction with 14 issues III Weighted priority rankings for 10 issues and IV Verbatim comments The data suggests broad support for 1 More consistent application of HACCP by industry and government 2 Development of a comprehensive K 12 food safety education program by the federal government and industry 3 Increased federal funding for microbiological food safety research 4 Increased focus on on farm practices for controlling pathogens and 5 Increased focus on the microbiological safety of imported food products There is little support for 1 Increased investment to control microbial pollutants in U S surface and ground water supplies 2 Increased federal food safety inspection programs 3 Increased use of finished product microbiological testing and 4 Development of a comprehensive global foodborne disease surveillance network Significant differences exist among stakeholder groups on selected food safety priorities Continued dialogue is needed to understand the basis for these differences and to develop potential approaches to addressing them
