An Emperor's Madness Or National Aberration? Ernesto Lugaro, 1916

Just Property Christopher Pierson, 2013-08-15 We live in a world which is characterised by both a radical inequality in wealth and incomes and the accelerating depletion of scarce natural resources One of the things that prevents us from addressing these problems perhaps even prevents us from seeing them as problems is our belief that individuals and corporations have claims to certain resources and income streams that are non negotiable even when these claims seem manifestly hostile to our collective long term well being This book is an attempt to understand how why and when we came to believe these things This first volume traces ideas about private property and its justification in the Latin West starting with the ancient Greeks It follows several lines of thinking which run through the Roman and medieval worlds It traces the profound impact of the rise of Christianity and the instantiation of both natural and Roman Law It considers the complex interplay of religious and legal ideas as these developed through the Renaissance the Reformation and the counter Reformation leading on to the ideas associated with modern natural law The first volume concludes with a close re reading of Locke We can find well made arguments for private property throughout this history but these were not always the arguments which we now assume them to have been and they were almost always radically conditional qualified by other considerations above all a sense of what the securing of the common good required These arguments included an appeal to the natural law to the dispensations of a just God to utility to securing economic growth and to maintaining the peace They almost never included the claim that individuals have naturally or God given rights that trump the well being especially the basic well being of other individuals In late modernity we have lost sight of many of these arguments to our collective loss
