Stock market development under globalization: whither the gains from reforms? Augusto de la Torre, Sergio L. Schmukler, Juan Carlos Gozzi, 2007. Abstract: Over the past decades, many countries have implemented significant reforms to foster domestic capital market development. These reforms included stock market liberalization, privatization programs, and the establishment of regulatory and supervisory frameworks. Despite the intense reform efforts, the performance of capital markets in several countries has been disappointing. To study whether reforms have had the intended effects on capital markets, the authors analyze the impact of six capital market reforms on domestic stock market development and internationalization using event studies. They find that reforms tend to be followed by significant increases in domestic market capitalization, trading, and capital raising. Reforms are also followed by an increase in the share of activity in international equity markets, with potential negative spillover effects on domestic markets.

Schmukler, 2007 Over the past decades many countries have implemented significant reforms to foster capital market development Latin American countries were at the forefront of this process The authors analyze where Latin American capital markets stand after these reforms They find that despite the intense reform effort capital markets in Latin America remain underdeveloped relative to markets in other regions Furthermore stock markets are below what can be expected given Latin America's economic and institutional fundamentals The authors discuss alternative ways of interpreting this evidence They argue that it is difficult to pinpoint which policies Latin American countries should pursue to overcome their poor capital market development Moreover they argue that expectations about the outcome of the reform process may need to be revisited to take into account intrinsic characteristics of emerging economies The latter may limit the scope for developing deep domestic capital markets in a context of international financial integration
