

The Global Challenge of Marine Biotechnology: A Status Report on the United States, Japan, Australia and Norway

Raymond A. Zilinskas, Rita R. Colwell, Douglas W. Lipton, and Russell T. Hill
College Park, MD: Maryland Sea Grant College, 1995, 372 pp. US$24.95 paper. ISBN 0-943676-59-2. Maryland Sea Grant College, University of Maryland, 0112 Skinner Hall, College Park, MD 20742, USA.

J. Leslie Glick University of Maryland University College, USA

Worldwide, marine biotechnology endeavors represent a small subset of all biotechnology activities. In the United States, in particular, which leads all other nations in biotechnology research, development, and commercialization, marine biotechnology plays a disproportionately minor role. The authors of The Global Challenge of Marine Biotechnology analyze the U.S. experience in marine biotechnology and compare it with the experiences of three other countries—Japan, Australia, and Norway. While the inclusion of Japan makes sense, in that Japan is a major player in marine biotechnology, it is curious as to why the authors selected the other two countries but not any others. A more representative perspective of marine biotechnology worldwide, or for that matter a more contextual assessment of marine biotechnology in the United States, would have been accomplished by looking at other countries besides Australia and Norway. Nevertheless, the book fills a niche, in that it provides a rationale for the technology, describes recent accomplishments in the field, and discusses the challenges facing product development and commercialization.

The book consists of an executive summary, glossary, introduction, nine chapters, and four appendixes. Chapter 1 provides a broad overview of the science and the technology. It is logically developed, but the treatment is too cursory. There is a tendency to flit from one subject to the next, and the discussion at times is a little too technical for nonbiologists. In view of the inclusion of a scientific and technical glossary, and especially given its prominence near the front of the book, this volume was clearly intended for nonbiologists as well as biologists. More explanation about the scientific fundamentals and the addition of figures illustrating those fundamentals would have made the book more readable to the layperson. Tables also might have been created to summarize the experimental results, thereby breaking up the monotony of discussing A's work, followed by B's work, followed by C's work, etc. Somewhat distracting throughout the book, but especially in Chapter 1, are the numerous typographical errors.

Chapter 2 represents a unique and interesting contribution. It discusses the results of two U.S. surveys conducted by the authors—one obtained from marine biotech companies and the other from academic and public sector laboratories performing marine biotechnology research. (Appendixes 2 and 3 comprise the survey instruments). The samples appeared large enough to provide practical information on similarities and differences in the goals, objectives, and strategies of the corporate and academic research laboratories.

Chapter 3 provides a useful overview of U.S. politics and funding policies pertaining to marine biotechnology, information that might be difficult for the reader to obtain elsewhere. In contrast, Chapter 4 is the Achilles' heel of the book. Its subject matter deals with the economics of marine biotechnology. Much of what is presented is muddled or useless, such as the theoretical treatment on how to measure a return on research and development (R&D) investment (pp. 132-34), and the sketchy discussion on aquaculture feed economics (pp. 142-43). There are also apparent inconsistencies, such as an estimate of $25 million (pp. 134-35) versus one of $2.11 million (pp. 124-25) for U.S. industry annual expenditures on marine biotechnology research in the early 1990s. More importantly, there is hardly any quantification of the current benefits of marine biotechnology or any attempt to forecast benefits. The authors believe that marine biotechnology will have potential payoffs in the pharmaceutical and bioremediation industries, but they make little effort to estimate how large those payoffs will be. Similarly, their economic analysis of the aquaculture market is incomplete, and they provide no projections as to the future economic impact of marine biotechnology on this market.

Chapter 5 deals sensibly with the health and environmental ramifications of marine biotechnology. Marred only by an assortment of typographical errors, the discussion is reasonably complete and evenhanded with regard to prior demonstrations of biosafety and the potential for risks in the future.

Chapters 6, 7, and 8 consider the status of marine biotechnology in Australia, Norway, and Japan, respectively. In general, these reviews are well done. However, Appendix 4, which lists marine biotechnology-related institutes
