Introduction

The Millennium Development Goals embody an emphasis on results, hence the shift of focus from inputs to outcomes. The different programs established by individuals and organizations may seem worthwhile, and sound compelling, but it is impossible to know if they are serving their purpose without collecting data and conducting evaluations. Evaluation is the "systematic investigation of the merit, worth or significance of the effort put in a particular program" (Rubin, 2020). Evaluation offers a detailed conclusion, provides strategic solutions and gives recommendations for the future.

With the four questions asked in evaluation; what happened, why it happened, why the results matter and what is next, evaluators are able to optimally design a project to achieve its goals. Evaluators understand the progress of the initiative and how to maximize its success. At the end, they assess the extent of the project in realizing its goals, in addition to identifying the circumstances resulting in both high and low success levels. Normally, teams within these programs collect data to gauge their progress, which is important, but they only focus on the big picture collaborative- wide instead of the underlying causes of the problems. They also do not offer recommendations (RHIhub, 2021). In contrast, evaluation does not overlook the tiniest detail as it seeks to create an opportunity for new adaptations, to maximize success. The process does not only impact the present of a program, but its future initiatives as well. Engaging more participants and incorporating their feedback during the evaluation, has a direct positive impact on communication and logistical support. It can only be successful if the right type of evaluation and stakeholders are involved.

Each of the different types of evaluation serve a different purpose depending on the determined program activities in the logic of the model to be evaluated. For instance, process evaluation determines whether or not the process was appropriately implemented, and how successfully the project followed the strategy, as stipulated in
