

Doubled Haploids

Gaining speed and greater genetic purity when developing inbreds

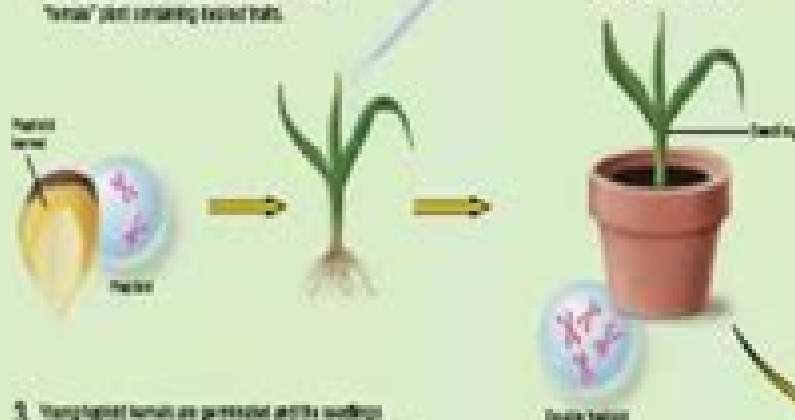

Definitions

- Chromosome Long stringy set of genes that carry heredity information.
- Haploid A cell containing one set of chromosomes.
- Homozygous Having identical genes or traits.
- Hybrid The product of a cross between genetically unlike individuals.
- Isodiploidy Homozygous line

1 Like all plants, corn is comprised of both male and female characteristics. On a corn plant, the male characteristics include the tassel — female characteristics include the ear and silks. When creating doubled haploids, breeders develop a unique "male" plant that creates haploid gametes to be crossed with a designated "female" plant containing desired traits.

2 The corn produces two containing units of regular and haploid gametes. Gametes are harvested by hand and haploid gametes are selected based on appearance. Gametes containing only genetic material from the female plant are haploid.

3 Young haploid gametes are germinated and the seedlings are then treated with a compound that doubles their genetic material making them genetically pure plants — meaning they contain only genes from their female parent.

4 The seedlings are then transplanted to outdoor nurseries for further research and development.

5 From this field, researchers select the best possible plants to be an elite parent for a Pioneer commercial hybrid.
