Simplified Calculation Method for Building Foundation Heat Loss/GainCalculation Example No. 1: Basement for a Residential BuildingCalculation Example No. 2: Freezer Slab

The practice of insulating building foundations has become more common over the last few decades. However, the vast majority of existing residential buildings are not insulated. It was estimated that in 1985 less than 5 percent of the existing building stock had insulated foundations. Earth-contact heat transfer appears to be responsible for 1-3 quadrillion kJ of annual energy use in the United States. This energy use is similar to the impact due to infiltration on annual cooling and heating loads in residential buildings (Claridge, 1988). In addition to the energy-saving potential, insulating building foundations can improve the thermal comfort, especially for occupants of buildings with basements or earth-sheltered foundations.

Typically, the foundation heat transfer is a major part of heating/cooling loads for low-rise buildings, including single-family dwellings, small commercial and institutional buildings, refrigerated structures, and large warehouses. A detailed discussion of the insulation configurations for various building types as well as various calculation techniques to estimate foundation heat transfer can be found in Krarti (1999). In this section, only a simplified calculation method is provided for annual and seasonal foundation heat loss or gain from residential foundations.
