The History of Technical Institutes

In 1956, Smith and Lipsett¹ stated that "although the present day technical institutes can trace their history back to the founding of the Ohio Mechanics Institute in 1828, the past twenty-five years have undoubtedly seen a more rapid development of the technical institute movement than any other quarter century." Today, the same statement holds true, but for different reasons.

From 1931 to 1956, the most significant developments in the growth of technical institutes included the Wickenden study conducted for the Society for the Promotion of Engineering Education (SPEE); the accreditation of technical institute curricula by the Engineers Council for Professional Development (ECPD); the establishment of the Technical Institute Division of the American Society for Engineering Education; the accumulation of a growing body of literature on the technical institute movement; the granting of the associate's degree for two-year technical institute programs; and the establishment of the McGraw-Hill Award to outstanding technical institute educators.

One of the major benefits of these efforts was the collection of data on the current status of technical institutes, allowing educators and practitioners to document growth and determine future directions. For example, only 9 of the 34 institutions listed in the 1931 SPEE study were predominantly technical institutes. The others were regular degree-granting colleges or universities or "industrial schools of mixed character." However, the Seventh Annual Survey of Technical Insti-
