Gun Control United States. General Accounting Office,1996 The Brady handgun control law imposed a five day waiting period on handgun sales to allow for background checks GAO s self initiated review of the first full year of the Brady bill s implementation discusses 1 how often the five day waiting period and background checks resulted in denying criminals and other ineligible persons the opportunity to buy handguns from federally licensed dealers 2 the extent to which such denials resulted in the arrest and the prosecution of convicted felons and other ineligible purchasers who falsely completed the handgun purchase application form and 3 the effects of the various legal challenges to the Brady bill Although GAO found that 4 3 percent of purchase applications were denied during the law s first year these results are not projectable to the universe of denials nationwide because standard and common criteria were not used to make denials      Gun Control United States.
