

European Border Controls: Who needs them?

Alan Butt Philip

Senior Lecturer, Centre for European Industrial Studies, University of Bath

This paper is an abridged, revised and updated version of a paper prepared for the Royal Institute of International Affairs in 1989. The author is very grateful to the RIIA for their support for his research in this subject, which is continuing.

1. INTRODUCTION

When Ernest Bevin defined his conception of European unity in the 1940s as the right to buy a ticket at Victoria Station and go anywhere he pleased in Europe without further formalities, few would have imagined how difficult it would be to realise such a simple ideal. In the United Kingdom the whole issue of the removal of internal border controls within the European Community (EC) was largely ignored by policy-makers, the media and the public until 1988. Now it is clear that a gulf has opened up in the Community between those who support the five countries that under the Schengen Agreement are committed to removing internal border controls by 1st January 1990, and those who share the views of the former British Prime Minister, Mrs Margaret Thatcher, who, according to her Bruges speech, still sees border controls as a major instrument of policy in the war against illicit drugs, terrorism and illegal immigration. Just below the surface of the argument are to be found lively and often emotional reactions to the issues raised by the proposals to dismantle intra-EC border controls: symbols of national identity are in question, challenges to the authority of the Community in this sphere are made, and concerns about the possible abuses of the new freedom to move around Europe are raised. This paper sets out to review the issues raised by the possible removal of border controls within the EC as a whole, with particular reference to the implications for the UK, and to suggest some practical ways forward for policy-makers. In the course of this analysis some alternatives to the existing pattern of border controls are also considered with reference to their likely effectiveness.
