Introduction

Most cultures in the world treat death as a sacred calling for the dying person to join the afterlife. Major religions such as Christianity hold that death on earth ushers in an eternal chapter in the life of the deceased. Despite the general views held by a particular society, individual opinions and beliefs regarding death and the dying process often vary greatly. The emergence of modern medicine has brought about artificial technology that may be used to prolong the dying process. This situation raises the question of quality of life. People are often divided over the usefulness of life support machines when the dying person can barely breathe. Some of the dying person's family members would wish to have him or her around much longer, even if it means staying in a vegetative state for years. The other category of people are worried that the dying person is unnecessarily subjected to pain, yet there is no hope of meaningful recovery. There is also the question of the dying person's wish and the need to strive to ensure it is fulfilled.

Research Objectives

The research seeks to fulfill the following objectives:

- To investigate the ethical issues that underline the issue of death and dying.
- To examine how such ethical issues are applied in the subject of death and dying.

Literature Review

According to Lichtenthal, death poses a challenging time for people, especially when they attempt to deliberate on interpersonal issues, financial concerns, and issues of medical care (311). Those left behind make these decisions since they will be the most affected in the end. For example, questions of how much to spend on the medical care of the dying person may be difficult if faced with financial constraints (Sudore and Fried 256). Ordinarily, family members and friends of the dying person would rather
