
ETHICS IN SCIENCE

By: Yasser Gaber

Scientists with good behavior act as role models to their colleagues and students and implant the concepts of integrity and research ethics. Scientific practice is not limited to teaching the basics of molecular biology and how to clone a gene. It is a holistic experience that prepares new scientists to join the scientific community. I would like to provide one real example of impressive behavior of one of the scientists.

After finishing my scientific journey in Europe, I returned to Egypt and started to supervise postgraduate students. One of my students worked at a research point that required assistance from one of my ex-supervisors. I sent an email asking for information and later asked for help with resources that are not available at my home university. My supervisor helped us finalize the project by providing the necessary resources, and sometimes by providing constructive feedback.

At the time of publication, I wanted to add my ex-supervisor as a coauthor since the contribution was significant, according to the CRediT Elsevier criteria; however, (he/she) refused the coauthorship as he explained that it is an assistance practice I usually do with different researcher around the world. Finally, (he/she) believed that "trivial" assistance should not be traded by coauthorship.

This story shows a good example of good scientific ethical practice. It might be imperative to rethink the currently utilized metrics to evaluate researchers and academics. To much stress on the number of the publications on Scopus profile and the H-index figure should be complemented with other metrics that might capture the real values shown by researchers and scientists, especially with their students, colleagues, and collaborators.
