

For instance, here's a good one.

During the last three decades of legal slavery in America, from the early 1830s to the end of the Civil War in 1865, African American writers perfected one of the nation's first truly indigenous genres of written literature: the North American slave narrative. The genre achieves its most eloquent expression in Frederick Douglass's 1845 Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass: an American Slave and Harriet Jacobs's 1861 Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl. Like all slave narratives, Jacobs's and Douglass's works embody the tension between the conflicting motives that generated autobiographies of slave life. An ironic factor in the production of these accounts can be noted in the generic title "Fugitive slave narrative" often given to such works. The need to accomplish the form's most important goal—an end to slavery—took narrators back to the world that had enslaved them, as they were called upon to provide accurate reproductions of both the places and the experiences of the past they had fled. While abolitionists urged slave writers to follow well-defined conventions and formulas to produce
