

The Hôtel Biron from the courtyard

THE HÔTEL BIRON AND THE RODIN MUSEUM

Among the great houses in the Rue de Varenne described in the guides of the eighteenth century as the "most remarkable of the realm", the Hôtel Biron, which became the Musée Rodin after the First World War, is one of the most beautiful, with the added charms of its magnificent gardens.

In 1728, Abraham Perenc de Moras, a lowly born but ambitious and entrepreneurial businessman, had made a large fortune speculating in paper money and was able to build his "hôtel" in a quarter only recently urbanized, near the royal foundation of the Invalides, "the most magnificent House in Paris". Its plans are attributed to Jacques Gabriel, Royal Inspector of the King's Buildings, with whom Perenc de Moras had had several property dealings, in particular in the Place Louis Le Grand, now the Place Vendôme. The project was actually carried out by another architect, Jean Aubert, who had designed the very grand Stables of the Château de Chantilly and had worked on the Palais Bourbon, now home of the National Assembly.

The rapidity of the realization of the project – only three years – probably accounts for the general harmony of the building which is a prime example of the Rococo or "Rocaille" style which flourished in the first quarter of the eighteenth century and whose characteristics are particularly visible on the garden façade with its central balcony resting on intricate stone brackets and the mask and shell motifs over each window.
