Morgan,2013-11-11 It is perhaps obvious to any student of Biology that the discovery of chemical processes in whole organisms has usually preceded the elucidation of the compo nent steps However it is perhaps less obvious that the unravelling of the se quences in which those chemical steps occur in living matter of the precise mechanisms involved and of the manner in which they are regulated would have been achieved neither by the study of intact plants and animals nor even of extracts derived from them Our ability to understand the nature and regulation of metabolism rests on two main premises the postulate that life processes can indeed be validly investigated with individual cells and cell free extracts and the thesis that there is an essential unity in biochemistry as Kluver put it 60 years ago that enables events in one organism to be legitimately studied in another Of particular utility in this latter respect has been the use of cultures of single celled organisms growing in defined media especially prokaryotes such as Escherichia coli and eukaryotes such as Neurospora and Saccharomyces sp to which both biochemical and genetical techniques could be applied It was of course Pasteur's observations of bacterial fermentations that first overthrew the belief that oxygen was essential for all energy yielding processes his recognition that La fermentation c'est la vie sans air laid the foundations of our knowledge of glycolysis
