The conditions for perfect erotic love, Furber and Callahan write in their interesting study, are «first, the recognition of the unity of sexual pleasure that can be shared by both men and women, and second, the abolition of sexual polarization through an understanding that each sex can be the other's double, psychologically and emotionally» (6). The ideal is seldom realized, however, for opposite these two conditions is invariably an «antagonistic movement that tends to emphasize distinctions which impede and thwart the continual process of subjective exchanges that gradually induce each sex to see and appreciate the other as its double» (6). Consequently, the majority of «personal relationships» in literature «reside in a vast territory that lies between the extremes of total identification with the opposite sex and radical sexual polarization» (7).

It is the intention of Furber and Callahan to chart some of this vast territory as it is displayed in works written over some 700 years—that is, from about the middle of the twelfth century to the middle of the nineteenth. I find their discussions very unequal, sometimes stimulating and commanding of the reader's assent, other times incomplete or poorly thought out. Both authors are university professors of French literature, and when the work examined belongs to this canon, which is more than half the time, their readings tend to be far more persuasive than otherwise. Thus the final explications in the book—of La Nouvelle Héloïse (129-36), Les Liaisons dangereuses (142-53), and several of Balzac's novels (157-80)—I find generally compelling and, indeed, the strongest parts of the argument.

Erotic Love in Literature begins by positing certain generalizations about the Middle Ages and then looking at the Tristan stories of Béroul and Thomas, the romances of Chrétien de Troyes, and Jean de Meun's continuation of Le Roman de la Rose. The specific readings are informative, but some theoretical assumptions are questionable or confused. The authors write, for instance,
