The purpose of this special issue is to provide a comprehensive overview of the current state of knowledge about the treatment of substance abuse in children and adolescents. The issue is organized into three main sections: (1) Overview of the Problem, (2) Assessment and Diagnosis, and (3) Treatment. The first section provides a general overview of the problem of substance abuse in children and adolescents, including the prevalence, risk factors, and consequences. The second section discusses the assessment and diagnosis of substance abuse, including the use of clinical interviews, self-report measures, and biological markers. The third section discusses the treatment of substance abuse, including the use of behavioral interventions, pharmacological treatments, and integrated approaches. The issue is intended to provide a comprehensive overview of the current state of knowledge about the treatment of substance abuse in children and adolescents, and to provide a basis for the development of effective treatment programs.
